NOTES

In his lecture on RVF 105, De Domo provides both a thoroughgoing paraphrase of the poem and an interpretation of its content, considering it within the context of the Canzoniere. Against the opinion of other commentators (arguing that the composition is without unity and has a specific addressee) De Domo argues that RVF 105 is the record of a secret dialogue occurring between Petrarch and Laura (and not between Reason and Sensitivity, as Fausto da Longiano - states De Domo - maintained). De Domo support this by focusing his attention on various RVF poems - positioned before and after RVF 105 - whose content assists his reading.

De Domo's interpretation to the poem stresses, moreover, that Petrarch loved Laura not only platonically (as she loved him), but also sensually.

Reference is made (among others) to many RVF poems (including RVF 22, 29, 56, 57, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 70, 73, 95, 96, 99, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 126, 214, and 269), and Sannazaro's Arcadia.
