NOTES

The two protagonists of the dialogue, Verzellino and Forzano, go to Chiabrera's suburban villa, hoping to meet the poet, but he is not there. They, nevertheless, enter Chiabrera's house, find his recently-delivered lecture on RVF 279 on a table, and read it. In this lecture, Petrarch's sonnet appears as a pretext for Chiabrera to speak about amorous and moral matters: the author deals first with both love, as a desire for beauty, and the sufferings that it can cause, and then focuses on solitude (by presenting it as a condition that can bring human beings to celestial contemplation, but also to bestial behaviour), and finally, while pausing on Laura's consolation addressed to Petrarch from the Heavens, discusses poetry's consolatory function. Reference is made (among others) to Apollonius of Rhodes, Euripides, Homer, Petrarch (RVF 278), Theocritus, and Virgil.
